Dear Domino's:

Let me get right to the point. I currently work as a chimney sweep in the Tri-County area, but I find that this work no longer challenges me and I want to advance my career. So I am looking for a job as a pizza delivery person. Although I am leaving my current profession, I decided that I would like to remain in the service industry generally and delivering pizzas seemed like the best choice.

How much is the starting pay for delivery personnel? I can send my resume with references. I have no driving violations within the past four weeks, and two of my prior violations are actually being contested in court. I think the testimony will show that I can drive fast and safe at the same time, so I would be more than happy to provide you with a court reporter's transcript of that hearing once it is completed. I am confident that with me as a delivery driver that people will get their pizza fast but without incident.

But just in the off chance, let me ask you this question. If I were to lose my license, HYPOTHETICALLY SPEAKING, based on a bad decision by the judge, would I be able to deliver pizzas using my bicycle?

Or another option IN THAT HYPOTHETICAL SITUATION if using my bicycle isn't fast enough for you is that I could get my friend Benny Heinrich to drive me whenever I have a pizza delivery to make. He has a Chevy Nova. I hope that wouldn't be a problem to have him hang around the store all the time when he isn't an employee or anything. Benny is a good friend and he would have no problem being there during my normally scheduled working hours. You wouldn't even know he was there. And then just anytime that I needed to make a pizza delivery, Benny would be the actual person driving the car, but I would be the delivery person who carries the pizza and collects the money. I might give a few dollars to Benny for gas money BUT THAT WOULD BE MY OWN MONEY and would not come from the pizza payment money. So you would have no financial obligation to Benny whatsoever.

Hopefully, none of this will be necessary. I really do think that I will be able to keep my drivers license. And like I said, my driving record has been clear for four weeks. (And it's only been TWO of those four weeks that Benny has been driving me around!)

So once we get all that out of the way, what benefits would I receive in being a member of the Domino's Team? Do you have dental coverage? I could use that. My teeth have suffered a bit in reaction to the soot in the chimneys. You would think I would need coverage for black lung or some other respiratory problems, but I haven't suffered from anything of that sort ::knock on wood:: But I could use some dental cleanings and whitening treatment, so I will require dental coverage.

Also, is there a profit sharing program for us delivery guys? There wasn't much of anything of that sort in the chimney sweeping industry. Please let me know.

I am just full of questions!!! Here's another one that has always made me wonder. Why is it that you chose to use the "two dot" - "one dot" domino in your company logo? Why is that the domino as opposed to say the "four dot" - "two dot" domino or even the "six dot" - "three dot" domino? Did you conduct any market research before deciding on the "two dot" - "one dot" model?

I have one last question for you. What ever happened to the Noid? Did he go on sabbatical or something? That guy was mean, but funny at the same time. Kind of like John Denver.

Please let me know about the job, salary, and benefits; and also whether my bicycle or Benny alternative methods of delivery would be acceptable in the UNLIKELY EVENT that I was unable to drive myself.

Sincerely,

Rusty Lucas

p.s. Will you send me a free Domino's Pizza baseball cap? I want to see how I would look in one since it would be a part of my standard delivery guy uniform.
