Dear Paste Makers:

I am a new parent and my little bundle of love is my absolute pride and joy. This is my first newborn child, although I do have a stepchild that I drive to school on a daily basis. I was not around when she was a baby, so I never had to feed her or burp her or change her. I've never done any of those baby tasks and I have to tell you that I had no idea babies ate, burped, and pooped so much! For such little guys, they sure are high maintenance.

We are going through diapers faster than a mysophobe goes through disinfectant wipes in the doctor's office waiting room during flu season. Not only am I finding out that taking care of a new baby is very time consuming, but it is also very expensive! I thought keeping gasoline in my car was tough on a fixed income, but keeping my baby in diapers results in even worse wear on my wallet.

There is no way I can continue to keep my baby in diapers and also maintain my model car and airplane hobby. I buy plastic models at hobby shops and on eBay and put them together in my basement. I have 3,238 fully assembled models in my climate controlled storage facility and another 942 still in the box waiting to be put together. On average, I buy about 12-15 new models per day and I put them together on evenings and weekends. This is a pretty expensive hobby when you account for the paint and glue and the price of rare hard to find models.

So keeping Junior in diapers is going to put a dent into that hobby unless I find some other solution. I am not going to get a second job, because I would then have no time to put my models together. I thought about buying cloth diapers and reusing them, but the thought of washing my own clothes in the same machine as poop is not appealing to me. I even tried scraping out the diapers and reusing them, but my wife found out and put a stop to that.

I was at the end of my rope, when I went to the store the other day. My wife sent me out for (what else?) more diapers. That's when I saw your butt paste product. I'm not sure why I never noticed it on the shelf there before.

I thought I found the answer to my problem. It made perfect sense. How do you stop a baby from pooping so much and so often? I can't just stop feeding the little critter! That would be neglect. But if I pasted those little rosy butt cheeks together, that would stop the poop from coming out. It really is a wonderful idea in theory. My wife always says she is worried that me and the baby aren't bonding enough at this early age. What better way is there for me to bond with my child?

You know, I've been around glue and paste my whole life. I buy model airplane glue in bulk -- but I always wear protective clothing and respirator masks when using that glue in low ventilated areas. I use Elmer's wood glue everywhere in the house. I even used it on the baby's crib. I use paste sticks and have a hot glue gun. And there are more things in my garage being held together by super glue than I care to even try to think of. With all of that personal experience, I never ever knew that there was somebody out there producing and marketing butt paste.

Of course, I would never dream of super gluing my child's butt together because the warning labels specifically state that it should not be used directly on skin. But your product is specifically made for use on baby butts. I couldn't believe my good fortune in finding your product and I was a little perturbed at myself for not thinking of this myself or looking for it sooner. But after I bought your product, brought it home, and spackled my baby's booty with Butt Paste®, I had the mother of all letdowns. It did not work! The poop is still coming as easy as ever and the bonding agent doesn't seem to be activating at all.

I remember reading once that post-it notes were invented by accident when a chemical formula for a new type of glue fell woefully short of expectations. I think your Butt Paste® might be the new post-it note. You just need to find a useful market/demand for a pleasantly scented ointment that goes on and cleans off easily.

Please let me know when you develop a new Butt Paste® formula so that I can try it out on my baby. I expect we'll have the little bugger in diapers for at least another two or three years.

Sincerely,

Rusty Lucas

p.s. Aside from collecting plastic models, I also have a smaller storage facility where I keep my baseball cap collection. I have a special section devoted to glues, pastes, and tapes. I usually wear a baseball cap from my favorite glue or paste company when I frequent the model convention shows in the area. That's no different than a Cleveland Browns fan wearing a brown cap when they go to a local football game. Do you have any Boudreaux or Butt Paste® baseball caps? If so, please send me one for free and I will wear it at the paste shows.
